

Organizing Files and Teaching Tips

Exported on: 5/23/2026, 5:11:14 AM

User

i nee you to review the files and organise into groups that are related

Gemini

It is a pleasure to meet you! Stepping into your first classroom is a whirlwind of emotions, especially when you're working in a new cultural context like South America. I've been through many "first days" myself, and I can tell you that while the language barrier feels high right now, your presence and enthusiasm are the most powerful tools you have.

To get us started on the right foot, could you tell me a little more about the specific age group of your students and the average size of your classes? Knowing if you're facing a room of thirty 8-year-olds or ten 15-year-olds will help me give you the most useful "bite-sized" advice.

In the meantime, I have reviewed and organized your library into logical groups. It looks like you have a mix of professional ESL resources for your students and quite a bit of esoteric research and media strategy files that seem related to a personal project or a new YouTube channel.

Organized Resource Guide

2 May, 15:56

Try again without Canvas

Your First Veteran Tip: Starting with Movement

Since you are dealing with potential language barriers and low literacy, our first strategy is to rely on Total Physical Response (TPR). This means your students should move their bodies before they ever try to pick up a pen.

Bite-sized Strategy: Mirroring & Commands Spend the first 10 minutes of your next lesson simply miming actions. Don't worry about them "knowing" the word yet. Just have them copy you.

1. Stand up (Teacher stands up, gesturing upward).
2. Sit down (Teacher sits down, gesturing downward).
3. Listen (Point to your ear and say Escuchen — eh-SPOO-chen).
4. Look (Point to your eyes and then to the board, saying Miren — MEE-ren).

This builds an immediate bond because they feel successful without the stress of reading.

I look forward to hearing about your class size and age group so we can dive into more specific plans!
